The Prime Minister appeared to be in excellent physical form. As he was puffing away at an out-size cigar, he laughingly remarked that he had smoked cigarettes, pipes, and cigars all of his life, and did not intend personally to be deterred by the raging campaign now being carried on against cigarette smoking.

This afternoon, Kenyatta, of Kenya, came to see me. I had Joe Wagner with me. Nothing in Kenyatta's appearance was indicative of what are alleged to be his habits of hard drinking, with the exception of his bil ious and somewhat bloodshot prominent eyes. He is a fine looking man, about six feet tall, his height accentuated by the red and white semi-turban he wore. He had rings on either hand, with gold-mounted semi-precious stones in iem. His cane was a curious ebony one, with silver filigree work. His companion, Dr. Mungai, seemed most intelligent. He was educated at Stanford University in California, where he was a classmate of the famous American doctor Dooley who recently died of cancer. Mungai went out with Dr. Dooley to Indochina. When he left there, he set up a clinic in Nairobi,
